The Horner family: land, war, and remembrance

Reader edition | v21.1 | 17 October 2026

In June 1860, a census enumerator recorded Spencer Horner as a 52-year-old farmer in Mulberry Township, Johnson County, Arkansas. Permelia appears immediately below him, followed by five younger people. The page places a household in view before the war: names, ages, birthplaces, work, and reported property. Four years later, a family account describes Spencer's killing and the shooting of William Riley Horner, identified in the archive's family reconstruction as his son. William's grave marker gives his death as 10 August 1864. These records bring us close to a family's losses, although they preserve different kinds of evidence [S01, S03, S04].

Daniel Bret Lingar assembled this archive to investigate that history. The story begins with land and a household, turns to the deaths remembered by descendants, and follows the questions those memories leave for researchers. Source numbers identify the records or attributed accounts behind each part. The separate correction register records changes to earlier editions.

A household before the war

The 1860 population schedule gives Spencer's occupation as farmer and his birthplace as Tennessee. It reports $1,500 in real estate and $1,500 in personal estate. Permelia is on line 2 of dwelling 698, family 699. The schedule does not state relationships: her identification as Spencer's wife comes from the archive's family reconstruction, rather than a relationship column on this page [S01, S04/S07].

Two dates matter. The printed census question asks who lived in the household on 1 June 1860. The page heading says the enumerator recorded it on 20 June 1860. A reference date and the date of recording can differ. Ages and values are information reported through an administrative record, not a complete account of a family's life.

The property columns show reported values, not a list of possessions. They cannot tell us whether the family kept money hidden or what later attackers wanted. Nor does the personal-estate total by itself establish whether Spencer enslaved anyone. That question requires separate investigation, including the 1860 slave schedule and other relevant records; this edition makes no finding about it.

The land record and its Choctaw connection

Three years before that census, a federal patent dated 1 April 1857 named Spencer Horner as an assignee: a recipient through assignment of a prior claim. The document identifies Choctaw Certificate No. 19B, in the name of Canne Chubbee, deceased, and names Co-cha-tubbee as a representative. It describes a total of 160 acres in sections 19 and 22, Township 12 North, Range 24 West, processed through the Fayetteville Land Office [S02]. The certificate number is visible; the original BLM/GLO accession and catalog fields still need independent checking.

The patent explicitly connects the certificate to claims under the Treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek and later federal acts. That connection belongs in the history of this land. The Choctaw Nation describes the 1830 treaty in the context of forced removal and provisions for Choctaw people seeking to remain in Mississippi [C1]. Spencer's patent records a later assignment within that claims history. It does not explain how this particular assignment was arranged, what Spencer paid, or what the claim meant to Canne Chubbee's family.

Those are questions about people as well as paperwork. Further research should follow the original claim and its representatives, rather than treating the Choctaw names as incidental to Spencer's title. Assignment of a certificate is not proof that Spencer was Choctaw. It also does not establish a precise modern house site. The four tracts and their later conveyances need to be traced separately.

The family and the reported attack

The later narrative attributed to Eva Horner in 1942 describes Spencer going toward the house, surrendering to approaching men, and being shot. It describes William Riley running away and receiving a head wound [S04]. In that family account, Spencer was killed and William was also a victim of the attack. The complete original manuscript has not yet been authenticated; the archive currently preserves published excerpts and later reconstruction.

The account also places two young Acord boys, John Samuel and Christopher Columbus, in the family setting. The archive identifies them as Spencer's grandsons through Elizabeth Horner Acord and Francis Marion Acord. It reports that both parents had died earlier in 1864. These relationships and the boys' presence are part of the family reconstruction, awaiting verification against the underlying originals. Christopher's reported age varies, so no exact age is chosen here [S04/S07].

The date 2 August 1864 is a working date, source not located in the materials verified for this edition. William's marker instead records his death on 10 August 1864 [S03]. One possible explanation is that an injury preceded a later death, but these materials do not establish that sequence. Spencer's exact death date also needs separately dated evidence. The two dates must not be made to corroborate one another by assumption.

Who's who

Person	Place in this history	Evidence and status
Spencer Horner	Farmer; patent assignee; victim of a reported wartime killing	Census and patent images establish entries in his name [S01–S02]; account of killing is later family testimony [S04]
Permelia	Appears on census line 2; identified as Spencer's wife in the family reconstruction	Entry examined [S01]; relationship needs separately cited family records [S04/S07]
William Riley Horner	Identified as Spencer's son; victim described in the family account	Relationship and attack account [S04/S07]; marker gives death 10 August 1864 [S03]
Dr. John Turner Horner	Identified as Spencer's son and William's brother; central figure in the later reprisal account	Family reconstruction/testimony [S04/S07]; formal Union enlistment unresolved

Person	Place in this history	Evidence and status
Elizabeth Horner Acord	Identified as Spencer's daughter and mother of the Acord boys	Family reconstruction [S04/S07]; supporting vital/family records to be checked
Francis Marion Acord	Identified as Elizabeth's husband and the boys' father	Family reconstruction [S04/S07]; individual records require verification
John Samuel and Christopher Columbus Acord	Identified as young grandsons whose childhood is connected to the attack	Later family account/reconstruction [S04/S07]; Christopher's age disputed

Here, S07 means a research register of leads, not an authenticated original record. The table makes the family account understandable without presenting every relationship as independently proved.

Remembering the deaths

William's marker attributes the killing to parties known to his family. It preserves a public accusation and a death date. It does not supply the killers' names or tell us whether an investigation, inquest, or prosecution followed. Its installation date and the date and maker of the surviving photograph are unknown [S03].

The 1942-attributed narrative continues beyond the attack. It tells of reprisals associated with Dr. John Turner Horner and reports seventeen of twenty attackers killed. That is a claim made by the family account, not an independently verified casualty total [S04]. The published excerpt places Jess Wilson with the reprisal group, holding its horses. No identification with a similarly named Confederate prisoner is made here.

Family memory gives this history its human urgency: people tried to explain loss, identify responsibility and tell later generations what had happened. Examining how those stories were recorded is part of preserving them. The next task is to compare the complete account with dated records, not to fill its gaps with a more dramatic narrative.

A short timeline

Date	Record or reported event	Source / status
1 April 1857	Federal patent to Spencer as assignee, using Choctaw Certificate No. 19B	Examined image [S02]
1 June 1860	Reference date specified on the population schedule	Printed heading [S01]
20 June 1860	Enumeration date written on the Spencer household page	Examined heading [S01]
Earlier in 1864	Deaths of Elizabeth and Francis reported in the archive's family reconstruction	Original supporting records still to be checked [S04/S07]

Date	Record or reported event	Source / status
2 August 1864	Working date for the reported attack	Source not located in verified materials; exact attack and Spencer death dates unresolved
10 August 1864	William Riley's death date on the marker	Memorial reading [S03]; does not by itself date the attack
1942, attributed	Recording of the family narrative associated with Eva Horner	Complete original and transmission history unverified [S04]

Questions the archive is pursuing

Which dated records can establish the attack and Spencer's death? What do complete military, pension and court records say about the people and events? Can the original family manuscript be located, dated and compared with later retellings? What became of the Choctaw claim and of each tract after the patent? What records establish the children's family relationships and later lives?

Location research is also reopened: historical tracts, reported coordinates and present parcels have not been reconciled. The archive's map is a research aid, not directions or permission to enter land. Details of official appointments, service-record leads and disputed identities belong in the research register, where each can be tested without interrupting this account.
